Research Interests:

Change processes in marital therapy
Treatment of infidelity
Forgiveness
Conceptualization and treatment of marital conflict
Theory and philosophy in marriage and family therapy

Research Plan:

My research represents some important steps to better understand therapeutic change processes, the treatment of infidelity, and the conceptualization and treatment of marital conflict. My primary purpose in researching these areas is to better inform the treatment of individuals, couples, and families and to improve the training of marriage and family therapists. With my change process research, I plan to build upon my current studies by empirically examining various dimensions of the theories of change developed in my recent research. I am also continuing my work on the treatment of infidelity, including a focus on the central nature of forgiveness in the process of healing from infidelity. Using data that has been previously collected and is currently being collected, the next few steps in my research plan involve the publication of the following articles:

1. Change in marital therapy: A grounded theory of the therapist's perspective.
2. Forgiveness intervention in the treatment of infidelity
3. A grounded theory of change for married couples in chronic conflict from the couple's perspective
4. The therapeutic pyramid: Character and competence in marriage and family therapy.
5. Constraining and facilitative beliefs in marital therapy
