As an international student at University of Nevada, Las Vegas since fall 2009, the disappointment I got from University's decision about the budget cut cannot be described. Cutting out the classes for international students is not a smart decision if you are look further in the future for both the university and the students.

Certainly the university has great staffs and facilities and provides fabulous courses for international students. The English Language Centre has staffs who really care for students. They would give students advice to take right courses for each students.

Cutting out English courses like English 113 and 114 would give international students to have even harsher time on studying in a foreign country. These courses give students to have chances to catch up the English levels and teachers understand each students' academic abilities and help as possible as they can like my teacher Mr. McGirr. If these courses were not here, I am sure significant number of students would drop out. The students would have to take classes with those native speakers or does not going to meet the requirements for graduation.
The university should think again about how the international students contributed to this community and how the decision make differences in the far future.
