Six representative plans of the Greek temple: (a) a temple in antis, in which the portico is formed by the projecting side walls of the naos with two columns set between their ends (antae); (b) Temple B at Selinus, Sicily, a prostyle temple, in which the columns stand in front of the naos and extend to its width; (c) Temple of Athena Nike on the Acropolis at Athens, an amphiprostyle temple, in which the prostyle plan has a porch added at the rear; (d) Temple of Hera at Olympia and (e) Temple of Aphaia at Aegina, peripteral temples, in which a single colonnade surrounds the naos; and (f) Temple of Apollo at Didyma, near Miletus, a dipiteral temple, in which two colonnades surround the naos. (Drawings are not to scale.)